WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

The low pressure system that brought some unsettled weather to the northern areas the past few days has moved into Oregon. Small afternoon cumulus clouds are likely over the northern mountains, otherwise today will be sunny inland and mostly sunny near the coast. Higher pressure and more stable conditions will be over Northern California for the near future. A weak low develops again off the coast Sunday but appears likely to be too dry to stir up thunderstorms. So the next 7 days will most likely be thunderstorm free. However, the presence of the low may lead to dry, unstable conditions over the fires. Seasonable temperatures, relative humidity and daily winds will be very seasonable with no extremes of those expected. Afternoon temperatures will be near to below normal with the warmest inland valleys in the 90s. Winds will tend toward diurnal patterns typical of any given area. Afternoon relative humidity will drop to seasonably low readings, and some areas may develop poor to moderate relative humidity recovery, especially in the mid and upper elevations of drainages. The marine layer at the coast will persist, but daytime clearing is likely.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

It will be sunny across the region with daytime highs in the 70s and 80s in the mountains and in the 80s to low 90s across the inland valleys today. Warmer and drier weather is expected across the inland areas Friday through the weekend. It will be breezy across the higher elevations of the Sierra, as well as across the Antelope Valley today, but hereafter winds will mainly be light and variable throughout the region. Minimum humidity will be in the 15-30% range across the inland areas, with teens becoming more common over the inland areas starting Friday with fair to poor overnight recovery.
